This Week in Labor History:

On March 22nd, 1886, the author Samuel Clemens, also known as Mark Twain, delivered a lecture entitled “The New Dynasty” in which he argued for the important role of the labor movement in securing the decent treatment of all workers, regardless of race or gender. Twain himself belonged to the International Typographical Union, and in the speech he posited, “When all the bricklayers and all the machinists, and all the miners, and blacksmiths, and printers, and stevedores, and house painters, and brakemen, and engineers...and factory hands, and all the shop girls, and all the sewing machine women....when these rise, call the vast spectacle by any deluding name that will please your ear, but the fact remains that a Nation has risen.” You can access the original speech here.

Respectfully,
